Myxomas are the most common primary neoplasms of the heart in both adults and children, and primary left atrial myxomas are rare. The echocardiographic features of left atrial myxoma in adults and children have been well described; however, the echocardiographic characteristics of left atrial myxoma in children remain undefined. The purpose of this study was to describe the echocardiographic characteristics of pediatric left atrial myxoma at initial diagnosis. We retrospectively reviewed the echocardiograms obtained at initial diagnosis of left atrial myxoma in children. We assessed the following cardiac ultrasonographic characteristics: tumor location, myxoma thickness, presence of thrombus, myxoma mobility, presence of a prominent pedicle, presence of a large feeding vessel, and infiltration of tumor into adjacent cardiac structures (ie, interatrial septum, right atrial appendage, and right ventricular outflow tract). Tumor location, tumor thickness, and myxoma mobility were correlated with disease severity as indicated by tumor size. We identified 25 patients (19 male and 6

I have a GridView which takes care of the number of the Rows and Items. But, I need to add more rows at the left end of the GridView. I have done this before but I cannot remember how. Is this possible or do I have to add Rows one by one? A: Yes, you should be able to add rows without the need to add a new row at the end. Create a new row with the same ID as the GridView. (Guessing by the SQL Server tag). In this case, I'm assuming that the ID's are auto-incrementing, so you can simply increment your last ID. UPDATE: I've just noticed that you tagged the post as ASP.NET MVC. You should be able to control the GridView through that framework (I've only done WinForms development, so I'm not familiar with the MVC model). The MVC docs have an excellent GridView example that uses a similar technique. Update 2: Using this GridView XAML, I was able to create a ColumnGroup that had two rows. The first row contains a TextBox (to assist in the editing). The second row contains a DataGrid with two columns (containing a and a element).
